Stapledon's unconventional approach to storytelling sets his work apart. Instead of focusing on individual characters, he adopts a grand perspective, charting the rise and fall of eighteen distinct human species over an unimaginable timescale. Each species, a product of evolution and ecological pressures, possesses its own unique culture, advancement, and ideology. This wide-ranging scope allows Stapledon to examine a vast range of philosophical and ethical issues, from the nature of progress to the potential of ultimate human fulfillment or extinction.

One of the most striking aspects of "Last and First Men" is its deep pessimism. While there are moments of wonder and even contentment within the narrative, the overarching tone is one of sadness. He uses the immensity of his timeframe to highlight the ephemeral nature of even the most dominant civilizations, underscoring the cyclical rhythm of rise, flourishing, and inevitable decline. This gloom, however, is not fatalistic; instead, it serves as a potent catalyst for reflection and a call for greater self-awareness.

The narrative style of "Last and First Men" is as original as its format. It's a mixture of intellectual exposition, historical narrative, and evocative description. Stapledon's prose is frequently conceptual, demanding the reader's engaged participation.
